Cervical lymph node metastasis of malignant melanoma, which is a rare entity, can be demonstrated ultrasonographically by the presence of intranodal cysts. The ultrasonographic features were as follows. In 18 patients, 76 metastatic nodes were examined in ultrasonographic examination. Metastatic node was generally round or oval in shape, and the size was varied from 1.5 to 15 mm (mean 7.0 +/- 2.1 mm). It had relatively more number of echogenic lines than the primary tumor. Echogenic lines with round configuration were often observed in metastatic nodes. A few swollen nodes with malignant appearance had irregular wall and ground glass texture. There were also some nodes with heterogeneous echogenicity and multiple cysts. In case of low suspicion of metastasis, a biopsy can be performed. In node with multiple cysts, excisional biopsy could be considered after a negative biopsy.const testScheduler = new Scheduler({

Field of the Invention This invention relates to power and data distribution systems for conveying signals from location to location. More specifically, the invention relates to distribution systems, particularly underground systems, for distributing signals to specific locations from the distribution center. 2. Background In order to provide reliable electrical power and communication signals to locations, a power distribution system and associated communication system are often required. In many applications, it is most effective to supply power and/or communication signals via a buried system. The buried system enables a reliable power and communication network to be implemented, by distributing electrical power and/or communication signals to specific locations at a selected depth in the ground (e.g., to predetermined zones). However, underground power and communication distribution systems tend to be complex and require significant capital expenditures to properly install and design. Thus, there is a need for providing the benefits of an underground power and communication distribution system without significant capital expenditures. The prior art includes distribution systems, power distribution systems, and communications systems that enable distribution of electrical power and/or information to locations. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 6,571,590 to Simko et al., issued Jun. 3, 2003, describes a multi-layer electric cable system that is pre-strung between a pair of power poles for use in electrical distribution. This multi-layer electric cable system includes a plurality of insulated twisted-pair electrical signal conductors that are used to convey electrical power between a pair of electrical conductors. The base of the insulating members that cover the plurality of insulated twisted-pair electrical signal conductors includes a plurality of conductive insulating pads arranged to accommodate the plurality of insulated twisted-pair electrical signal conductors.
